Comment

The Pharisees weren't the first to argue about the indissolubility of marriage, and they won't be the last. Besides, they were looking to trap Jesus, who was clearly introducing something new under the old sun that beat down on the old streets of Israel. The Pharisees asked whether it was permissible for a husband to divorce his wife. This is a disingenuous question, of course. They may have cared about the hotly contested argument among rabbis about this very question, but they were primarily out to get Jesus. He took their question at face value and set before them an ideal for which his followers still strive. God's law supersedes the concessions of Moses, Jesus says. And, he adds, the man and woman who are joined in matrimony are joined as equal partners-husband and wife. Fidelity is required of both spouses, not just the wife, as the Pharisees' question implies, when they ask, "Is it lawful for a husband to divorce his wife?" Jesus' response sends us back to Genesis, today's first reading. In this reading, it is as if Adam is trying to educate God about how hard it is to be one of a kind. He has dutifully named all the animals, an ancient people's indication of superiority that unfortunately does not make for a fully satisfying partnership. Adam, we might imagine, has tried to be faithful, grateful, and glad that his creator had set him over all these animals in their stunning variety. But he remains lonely, all of the animals together do not equal one single human being, who is at once like him and other than him.

So, God created Eve to be Adam's equal partner on this earth.
